ABOUT The Rite of Spring

Seeta Patel marries Indian classical dance and Western classical music in her The Rite of Spring.

Taking the South Indian classical dance form of Bharatanatyam, with its intricate rhythmic footwork, geometric and dynamic movements and expressive prowess, Seeta Patel has created a compelling interpretation of the iconic The Rite of Spring.

Unusually, this version subverts the original narrative tradition of a single sacrificial Chosen One by elevating this character to a deity unto which the whole community sacrifices themselves. This is a spiritual exploration of a work through an Eastern philosophical lens. This is a rare chance to see Bharatanatyam performed in an ensemble piece. As an added feature, Seeta Patel will open the evening's show with a solo performance accompanied by South Indian musicians. The piece shows Bharatanatyam as it is often presented in a solo format, and will take us on the journey of Mother Earth from birth to destruction, preparing us for Her deliverance through The Rite of Spring.

Accompanied with a recorded score by Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra, this is a Rite of Spring but not as you know it.

ABOUT Bharatanatyam

BHARATANATYAM is a holistic and comprehensive dance form which is very expressive on many levels combining abstract movement and storytelling. Every single element of the body is used.

Originating from the Southern state of Tamil Nadu, this South Indian classical dance form shares two main components; Nritta the pure dance aspect, featuring the movements of the body, footwork, geometry, shapes and patterns. Abhinaya, the second component, is about the storytelling and expression through using face, body and hand gestures alongside its relationship to the poetry and music, which is the throughline across the whole dance form.

Choreographer's Note

Stepping into the world of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring is like walking into a calm, shallow, sun kissed pool, but feeling that there is something much bigger than anything you've ever known about to consume you. This brings anticipation, excitement and a strange sense of foreboding.

For me the first part of the work is like a game, no-one knows who the chaser is or who is being chased. But the excitement is palpable, the dancers still youthful and full of hope, being pushed and pulled by the energy around them. The music guides the pathways and patterns, be it as frantic searching, joyful play or reverent submission to a higher force. This part is mercurial, changing at every turn. Unexpected, never allowing you to rest in one place, and it is the same for the dancers. They give themselves to the violent yet energising ebb and flow of the music, mere servants to the power of nature.

I have chosen to split the two halves of the music with a short interlude that takes the form of an ethereal dream. A moment of calm that draws us for a fleeting breath into the mind of the Chosen One. A gentle, nurturing place that welcomes the Chosen One with warmth and love and strains of a magical voice. But we soon realise that the hope of the Chosen One that their fate will be kind is just a dream. As Stravinsky's score enters the space again, we realise these hopes cannot be fulfilled.

As we follow the journey the Chosen One must take, there is a sense of fate and duty, an inevitability that the burden placed upon their shoulders must be fulfilled. The Chosen One, forbidden to choose, yet who must prove that they are worthy. The Sacrificed becomes the Divine unto whom we must all submit. The Mother, the Earth, the Goddess: Nature herself.

Stravinsky's score is a visceral, pulsating heart filled with the life force of the Earth and all who reside within her. It has been a humbling and exhausting experience creating this work, and it is my hope that with the power of Bharatanatyam coursing through mine and my dancers' veins has taken this iconic work to a new place with honesty and respect.

I dedicate this performance in loving memory of my late father Sureshbhai Rambhai Patel, and my late music teacher Bhagvatulu Seetarama Sharma Sir.
